

DR. KATHARINE ELLIS of Cambridge, in her 2013 book (“The Politics of Plainchant in fin-de-siècle France”) found evidence that Dom André Mocquereau modified the rhythm of the official edition seeking financial gain. In other words, by changing the official rhythm, Dom Mocquereau made his editions proprietary. The phrase Dr. Katharine Ellis constantly uses is: “value-added.” Below is the evidence Dr. Ellis found:

The Politics of Plainchant in fin-de-siècle France which he disapproved, because the typography constituted part of the innovation.<sup>24</sup> He could not access it.

Unsurprisingly, Dom Mocquereau was ultra-sensitive to anything that threatened that ‘value-added’. When, in January 1905, he discovered that the Vatican printer Scotti was planning a commercial edition using the Solesmes rhythmic signs he raged at De Santi in terms that precisely accord with Combe’s account of the 23 March 1904 meeting, while also emphasizing the financial imperatives at stake and the sense of betrayal. For him and for the abbey, the entire system and its signs were ‘our only means to . . . . .’ [seul moyen pour nous . . . . .].<sup>25</sup> And an annotation to an incoming letter of the previous year speaks volumes about abbey policy. When Clément Gaborit warned Dom Mocquereau that, because of the vacuum created by the absence of a Vatican ‘recommended edition’, Pustet would be at liberty to prepare his own edition from original sources, someone (not Dom Mocquereau) wrote: ‘Put as many rhythmic signs as possible in the Gradual and the Antiphoner.’<sup>26</sup> Given the situation of all French Benedictine communities in the wake of 1901, the exclusion clause for the rhythmic signs was a move born of necessity. Nonetheless the entire deal was a model of financial and political acumen. In return for its concession of the basic copyright, Solesmes offered the Holy See free labour on the edition itself, thereby ensuring enhanced control of the editing process. In addition, having established the abbey’s copyright claims over those of Dom Pothier to the satisfaction of both De Santi and Pius X, Solesmes collectively removed any basis for continued activism over the question of whether Dom Pothier or indeed anyone else – for the Abbot Primate had designs of his own – had legitimate copyright claims over existing Solesmes texts.<sup>27</sup> Among the principal actors no one, after all, would be likely to complain that their copyright had been offered to the Pope, and Dom Pothier had in any case already offered up what he considered his own copyright.

<sup>25</sup> Typed copy of letter to De Santi, 19 January 1905. SO (paléo): ‘Commission Vaticane 1905, XIII’. The dots, which are original, might either be an intentionally deafening silence or a private breaking off from copying, Mocquereau having no need to explain to himself what was patently obvious. The former interpretation seems more plausible, given that no other letter I have seen contains such a gesture.

<sup>26</sup> ‘Mettez le plus possible de signes rythmiques dans le Graduel et l’Antiphonaire’. Annotation to a letter from Gaborit to Mocquereau, 20 January 1904. SO (paléo): Corr. Mocquereau.

<sup>27</sup> New ventures such as Pothier’s Cantus Mariales published by Mme Poussiélgue were, however, a different matter. Noetinger, for one, viewed them as theft. SO (paléo): undated note to Mocquereau. It is also interesting that, in a section preceding his account of the transfer of copyright to the Vatican, Combe leaves the copyright question in limbo, claiming that it belonged to Solesmes but only while Pothier remained there (Histoire, p. 268; Restoration, pp. 235–6). Such an interpretation is inconsistent with the resolutions of the Chapitre Général in 1894.

* Note from Jeff Ostrowski:

It goes without saying, we can never know somebody’s motives. All we can do is reproduce what Dr. Ellis found. The results of the modifications made by Dom Mocquereau were catastrophic, causing immense harm. Was Dom Mocquereau really seeking financial gain for his monastery? Again, it goes without saying: we can’t know for sure.

Some claim Mocquereau added the markings in order “to be faithful to the original.” We know this is not true. For instance, Dom Mocquereau added markings to the INTROIT for December 8th (an INTROIT which was composed circa 1879). Needless to say, one cannot add “ancient” markings to a piece composed in the 19th century. Nor can one “correct” the music of Claude Debussy using a score written by Guillaume de Machaut.
